The first thing I loved about earbuds from Raycon—the company that's owned by singer and former reality TV star Ray J—is the sound they make when you put them on. A lot of earbuds power up with an English woman announcing, in a robotic voice, "Power. On." These earbuds sound like the old Sega Genesis console when they activate. "Ray-Connnnn!" I'm surprised that this headset costs only $80. The buds are perfectly sized, with enough weight to keep from bouncing around in your ear, they have a fantastic clicky button that's a cinch to operate (why don't more earbuds have clicky buttons?), and the carrying case, unlike that of most headsets on the market, is actually snug enough to sit in your pocket. I imagine these are the sort of earbuds that, despite what they may want, most consumers actually need. They do everything a headset needs to do, and they cost less than $100. That's less than half of Apple's AirPods Pro, by the way.
